Most roguelike games have a straightforward gameplay system where the goal is to find the best weapon, armor, and other equipment to attack the monsters. Luckily for players of Crayon Chronicles, the combat is far from traditional. In Crayon Chronicles, you don't have to find the best equipment, you're automatically given random equipment, you can get as many pieces of armor and weapons as you can afford, and you get to decide what stats to put on your equipment. The first thing you'll notice in Crayon Chronicles is that the game allows you to attack and defend at the same time. This is far from a small feature. During a battle, you can move your player character as well as attack and defend, and other players can attack you, which allows you to divide your time between the two. Another surprising feature is the amount of stats and items you're given at the start of the game. In one battle, I was given enough armor to build a full set, I was given enough weapons to build a set of every weapon, and I was given enough food to build several additional stacks. The campaign is fairly linear with no story elements or other features. The stories are largely told through three or four very short chapters that give you a story with each character's backstory. The art is beautiful, although a little short on features. The sound is a little off, as the music seems to get louder when you are about to move. The combat in Crayon Chronicles is not a traditional rogue-like, but that doesn't mean it isn't fun. The combat is very similar to Final Fantasy X, with the addition of some manual control to counter enemy attacks, which makes the combat fun and engaging. The default setting for the controls is for the player to use their WASD keys for movement, and the space bar for attacks, but as mentioned above, there is a choice for a directional-based system as well. Crayon Chronicles: Features: Crayon characters Tons of equipment Great art Pricing: LITE version -60% OFF until June 6th -50% OFF until June 13th Full version -$4.99 USD -$5.99 USD -$6.99 USD Crayon Chronicles is a very interesting Rogue

Questions of Life, the Universe, and Everything, with James P. Hogan, PhD Join James P. Hogan for the Deep Questions of Life, the Universe, and Everything as Hogan explores the most profound and essential questions about life. Someone tells you they know how to find you. They say, "I have a key and I know where you live. All I need is your name." And they present you with a very expensive key. The question is: Does your new key fit? As the story suggests, isn't good information free to anybody with a little bit of time and thought? But then, are there really any answers for the questions we spend our lives asking? [Note: The video above was originally filmed in September 2013.] This week we look at the 2011 Harvard study, "How people find their own names." (The "vision audio" of the audio interview is free. The publisher (Rodale) gives away video and audio publishing rights for free online. They do this because online distribution of information creates more demand and profit. They're just following the laws of economics. But now with audio and video, the readers of the site are largely customers at R.E.A.L. or aren't interested in investing their time and money into seeing the video. Even so, because of free audio and video, they're spread all over the world, so we're in business with thousands of new subscribers-all the time-who can't see or afford the video. Those who can afford to sit through the video will discover this problem of the present that the Harvard Study found: "Of the people most likely to search for a personal name in IMDB, only 30 percent search for it on Rotten Tomatoes." That surprised me, but what's most surprising, to me, is that "15% of those people who search for a name on IMDB will also search on Rotten Tomatoes." I guess you have to have access to both information databases to do that. My assumption is that maybe, just maybe, Rotten Tomatoes has an index of which movies are popular, what critics liked, and so on.

“Politicking” is a game that caters to your current political views. The player is given the opportunity to play as several famous politicians from around the world and from the past. Their political views and popularity is displayed to the player at each stage in the game. You are then able to destroy your opponent with the use of your weapon of choice. Play as American, Trump, a rightwing zealot, a rich socialist, a black militant, a communist, a fascist, a gay fighter for gay rights, a conservative boxer, a democrat, a liberal pacifist, a democrat boxer or a feminist. For many years, the feature that made Evernote so popular was its strong privacy protections. But last year, as research was underway at UC Berkeley, a student started losing faith. She started using a different note-taking app, and she noticed something was different. Instead of encrypting data when sending it from her phone to Evernote servers, the student's new app contacted a website to obtain passwords and other private information. Confusing? Impossible? Both? None of these things? That's the problem when the companies that build internet-connected hardware are also the companies that control the information that flows through them. And it's been going on for at least a decade. Even those who wanted to increase security are frustrated by how difficult it is to do so. Two years ago, we reported that Google's Nest Learning Thermostat couldn't connect to the internet because its manufacturer, Nest, refused to give it the necessary keys. (Nest was eventually forced to give them up.) And that's just one example. There's also the strain that internet-connected hardware puts on those who want to keep their information private. The internet's servers can be hacked, and they're often connected to things that are either hard to find or don't exist at all. It doesn't have to be this way. We can build machines that do a better job of protecting our data. And we can apply a basic rule: Every internet-connected device should connect to only one place, and that one place shouldn't be able to see our private information. Doing so would make us much better prepared for the kind of information and privacy theft that happened with the student's password-leaking app. As the internet began to wind down, the hazards of connectivity were pretty well known. But as the surveillance state took hold, there
