utilisation in the early postoperative period: a nested case-control study using prospectively collected data.
Patients undergoing surgery in the early postoperative period (EPO) are at high risk of perioperative morbidity and mortality. Emergency room (ER) utilisation in the EPO may be of particular value for the early identification of patients at risk. The aim of this study was to assess the relationship between ER admission in the EPO and 30-day perioperative complications. A case-control study nested in a prospectively collected database of 4200 consecutive surgical patients, undergoing elective major surgery from January 2004 to April 2006. Patients from the study cohort were grouped according to whether they were admitted to the ER in the EPO.

Controls were all other patients who were not admitted to the ER in the EPO. All perioperative complications within 30 days of surgery were recorded. The relationship between the risk of perioperative complications and ER admission was assessed by conditional logistic regression analysis, controlling for multiple confounding variables. In multivariate analysis, ER admission in the EPO was associated with a significant two-fold increased risk of any perioperative complication (odds ratio [OR] 2.11, 95% confidence interval [CI] 1.38-3.22).

Increased risk was also found for perioperative cardiac complications (OR 2.15, 95% CI 1.30-3.56), and pulmonary complications (OR 2.37, 95% CI 1.39-4.06). This cohort study, nested in a prospective database, shows that ER admission in the EPO is an independent risk factor for 30-day perioperative morbidity and mortality.
