For example, your internet service provider may have the option to give you a 128 Mbps download and 1 Mbps upload. These speeds are well over 100 Mbps, and represent the fastest available to you. It should be noted that these types of connections will run faster only when it is able to simultaneously download and upload a large amount of data (like the maximum possible at the time). If that isn't an option, there's little reason to go over the minimums set by the FCC for broadband. Depending on which internet provider you choose, there may be options to choose from in internet service plans that are far beyond the minimums set by the FCC. Make sure that the ISP you choose can support those speeds before you make the investment. However, the speeds in your plan may not be truly unlimited, so you should evaluate the plan carefully in order to understand what they can and cannot do. New internet speed standards have been adopted by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), but most homes still don't have anything faster than the minimums set in 2015. According to the U.S. Congress, the minimum download should be 25 Mbps and the minimum upload should be 3 Mbps. The average U.S. internet connection speed (of providers who have upgraded) is around 830/80 Mbps, which is significantly slower than the minimums set by the FCC. With that in mind, if you have a Plex Media Server and you upload movies to it, you probably want to make sure that the maximum bitrate of the movie files you upload exceeds the speed you have on your internet connection. If you do that, you'll make sure that the content you're streaming to your Plex Media Server doesn't suffer any pauses as it downloads data.
