"I'm glad there are no new features in Lightroom," he said and laughed. "And one thing I really appreciate is Lightroom's overall reliability. There have been no stability issues with it," he added. This is just an area of software that I have not found time to explore. That said, a couple of months ago, I did a simple review of Lightroom 4.3. If you'd like to read that, you can find it here . All in all, I love Lightroom. I was already using it when I first tried Lightroom 3 and continued to use that through Lightroom 4 and 5. I see no reason to stop using the software. The sharpness of the picture is considerably improved. It is this new development that finally justifies the upgrade. For in-depth and complicated printers, the answer is "selective scientific printing" exactly. For simple, spot prints - especially the latter is the case - the "black" will suffice. This in turn leads to a sharper picture, especially where the toner element is to be used. In the past, this has evaporated additional ink, resulting in poorer prints. No longer! The toner-rich black minimizes this effect, so you get superb prints with your lasers. The new dynamic range and extended toner extraction along with a new combination of the two can detect toner-rich areas very accurately, and thus produce unsurpassed prints. The previous methods for determining the toner content of a print can only guess at this. With so many layers of paper and toner above that black background, no one has ever had the opportunity to directly measure how much toner had been used to achieve the desired print.

The DNA methyltransferases (Dnmt) encoded by the mouse genome are capable of directing the synthesis of 5mC within CpG sites of genomic DNA. In addition, these enzymes can mutate or silence genes by altering transcription. To follow the dynamic changes in the abundance of Dnmt1 transcription across the mouse genome as these DNA methyltransferases are recruited to chromatin, tiling arrays were used to measure 7.5kb fragments encompassing the Dnmt1 gene and its upstream region. The following C57Bl/6J mice have been used with unique barcodes for tiling array usage: pregnant dam (G3) and pup (P3), 129S6 cross (129S6), and BL6J mouse (Bl6).
